We've recently mused on marble's staying power, but in the kitchen the material always feels like a natural fit. These five homes show that the striated stone is apt for applications far beyond the traditional countertop, with marble-clad backsplashes, islands, and even walls.

In a classic Berlin building, Bruzkus Batek Architects made copious use of Nero Marquina marble from the kitchen countertops to the living area, where a strip of the black stone wraps dramatically around around the room.
